INTRODUCTION

THE Miller family is an old New York State family. John and George Miller came in 1640 from Maidstone, Kent, England, and settled in Southold, East Hampton, L. I. Their descendants were well-considered members of the community and took part in communal and higher public administrative affairs. Two of them, father and son, Burnett Miller and Dr. Matthias Miller, were members of the Constitutional Convention in 1777. The genealogy of the Miller family tells us a good deal of old New York history and of the gradual intermingling of the Dutch families with the best English stock of the state. During the 18th century, the Miller family intermarried with pure Anglo-Saxon stock, but in 1804 Judge Morris Smith Miller married Maria Bleecker, a scion of one of the oldest Dutch families in the country. His daughter-in-law, Cornelia Jones, was also of half English, half old Dutch stock. The group of families engrafted on the old Miller family tree has had an important position in all public affairs.

It would be difficult for Miss Miller, the owner of the present collection, to take her faithful bulldog for a walk through the downtown district without using one of the streets named after her ancestors. We may mention Bleecker Street, Duane Street, Great Jones, Little Jones and Jones Streets, Haring Street, Livingston Street, Van Dam Street, Rutgers Street, and last, but not least, Cornelia Street, which bears Miss Miller's own first name—a name that has been borne by women of her family for eight generations. These street names remind us of the comfortable days when streets were not only ways and means to get from somewhere to somewhere, of the days when one could still have a walk in the city along paths overshadowed with trees, in short, of the days when men and streets were individualities, not numbers. To the average New Yorker, "Little old New York" is something romantic and remote, like the shades of the Gothic period or of the Italian Renaissance; to the eighth of the Cornelias, the past has a closer and more vivid meaning. It is almost reality. One can understand why she, as well as those nearest to her, has taken a vivid interest in the furniture and ornaments of the past.

We wish to emphasize that not all the objects of this sale are old family heirlooms. Miss Miller and her mother have been ardent collectors. The collection, which is now being sold because they have given up their old family home in Ninth Street, consists partly of family pieces, partly of pieces which they acquired. The important family pieces are designated as such, and are accompanied by affidavits, sworn to by Miss Miller and her mother.

Nevertheless, there is a unity of spirit in the collection; and this homogeneity extends even to things that do not seem essentially Colonial, such as, for instance, the Oriental rugs. Oriental rugs were, of course, imported into the United States as early as the 18th century. Dried codfish from New England found a ready market in the Mediterranean, and in the return cargoes of the ships that took it there were not only the celebrated Bilbao mirrors, but also "Turkey carpet" for the well-to-do houses. Such a carpet is shown, for instance, in the portrait of George Washington in the Pennsylvania Academy, where the Father of his Country is seen standing on a fine Smyrna rug with a yellow ground. Miss Miller's rugs have none of the washed-out colors and lame design that are now supposed to "go well" with period furniture. They are gay in color and determined in design. Her series of Baku rugs is enough to make the mouth water, it one is interested in Oriental rugs that have been woven without a side glance on the European market. Her collection of samplers has also been chosen with taste and imagination. It contains specimens from Holland and Vriesland, which are somewhat more fanciful and exuberant than the well-behaved Anglo-Saxon types.

The first part of the collection contains both furniture and objects of art, while the second part will contain mainly objects of art.
